Lightroom's main goal was to work in a streamlined manner and provide a great workflow. The core features are robust and the controls respond similarly to DSLRs and compacts. The importing function has been improved with the capability to import single RAW files. A new feature, blending, allows you to combine exposures of different exposure settings. This mode allows you to clean up the images, give them more depth, and eliminate white patches. Thanks to Photoshop's brush tool, the blending mode is very effective. B: Able to create a large catalog with previews and artboards, but I can't see why you would. True, the previews are convenient, but everything else in Lightroom can be done without them. True, having four, miniature versions of a file or a library is a great idea, but that's the idea. In my experience, the rationale behind this feature is ridiculous, and the so-called benefits of having a "tiny" catalog are mostly just a novelty, although very much at the disposal of those used to CS6 and higher. In any case, I would much rather have seen the new feature focused on organizing the photos with a massive catalog. The need to crop an image and then send a bad zipped file to a client, or needlessly select a bunch of profiles and send them to the servers, is just a stone's throw from a fly-by-night photoshopper looking for ways to make it easier to pass unfinished files on to his friends. C: It's worth mentioning that Lightroom 5 still has the options you expect to see in other products: it has a copy, rotate, and straighten tool, and it has a lot of color correction functions. All of these tools are fast and very easy to use, like they have always been. However, this is not the case for the other important tool: the Dodge & Burn. Once I started using that tool, I came to a realization. I haven't seen or used a graphical adjustment tool in over a decade. The options are always there, but it is still better to have a slider than a color wheel. I know that the right color and transparency choice are vital. But still, to find that option, I need to choose 'Color Spots' from the left pane and then, from there, select the color I need to use.
